

It's happened to us all. You're out with friends having a casual drink and you haven't planned on not driving. It wasn't your intention to wind up over the limit but here you are.

A couple of drinks after work and "Hey, it's just around the corner" you say to yourself. "It's not as if I'm drunk."

The real question is this - "Is it worth it?" Consider the cost: the loss of your licence; the loss of money in fines; the inconvenience of not being able to drive; the embarrassment.

The answer is obvious. It's a resounding, "No, it's not worth it."

So the next time you realise you're just over, and let's be honest if you think you may be over then you probably are, leave the car behind. If you do drive just over then chances are you'll just get caught.

Just over? Just don't drive.

It's a very common occurrence, you're having a sociable drink, not expecting to end up over the limit, but nonetheless, that's how you find yourself. You have the car and no alternative plan for how to get home. A bit over the limit?

Who's it going to hurt?

The reality is that you don't have to be seriously drunk to cause serious injury. There are innumerable cases of people who are incapacitated, confined to wheelchairs or drastically impaired as the result of car accidents caused by drivers who were just over the limit. How would you feel living with the knowledge that, as a result of your actions, someone else had their life destroyed?

Next time you've had one too many and you find yourself just over, leave the car behind.

Just over? Just don't drive.
